The first separation occurred in the 4th century bce at the time of the second council. Theravada Buddhism, as a popular religion based upon numerous small, local monasteries, adopted probably from the Tai, was spreading all over the region. The northern Vietnamese, who had originally been organized in self-contained kingdoms without any concept of royal divinity, owing an intermittent

Differences Between Theravada and Mahayana Buddhism

First, it seems that there was a schism around the time of the Second Buddhist Council in 334 BCE. This was a split between the reformist Sthaviras and conservative Mah s ghikas. Although this isn't directly tied to the split between Theravada and Mahayana Buddhists, it is suspected by many scholars to be the origin of these two schools. Another view on the split comes from
